

Complementiser agreement as subject doubling: the view from Brabantic

Many Dutch dialects have complementiser agreement: the complementiser of an embedded clause bears a morphological marker reflecting the features of the embedded subject. This is illustrated in (1).

1. Ik wait da-st doe de woarheit zeg-st.
I know that-2SG you the truth say-2SG
"I know that you are telling the truth" (Stadskanaal Dutch)

Other Dutch dialects have subject doubling, illustrated in (2).

2. ...dan goa-de gij mee t'n auto.
Then go-2SG you with the car
"...then you're going by car." (Rucphen Dutch)

In this talk, I argue that some cases of complementiser agreement should be treated as subject doubling, mostly based on intervention effects: the effect of inserting material between the complementiser and the subject. This analysis leads to the prediction that subject doubling and complementiser agreement show the same kind of intervention effects. I show that this prediction is largely correct in a Brabantic Dutch dialect with subject doubling.
